

Susan Moore Johnson

Susan Moore Johnson is the Jerome T. Murphy Research Professor in Education at the Harvard Graduate School of Education, where she served as academic dean from 1993 to 1999. A former high school teacher and administrator, Johnson has an ongoing research interest in the work of teachers and the reform of schools and school systems. Johnson is director of The Project on the Next Generation of Teachers, where she and colleagues study how best to recruit, support, develop, and retain a strong teaching force. Their first book, Finders and Keepers: Helping New Teachers Survive and Thrive in Our Schools, reports on the experiences of 50 new teachers over four years. Subsequent research focuses on teachers' careers, alternative preparation, the role of unions, hiring, induction, performance-based pay, teacher teams, and teacher evaluation. She is the author or co-author of seven books and many articles.
